Sr. Manager, Global Pricing Operations

I traveled around the world, managing the pricing teams in North and Latin America, Europe, the Middle East, Africa, Asia Pacific and Japan. This taught me how to work with people from different cultures. In Japan, for example, I discovered that when people said “yes” it meant they understood—not that they agreed! I also learned how to connect with people at every level within an organization, from executives to salespeople to administrators.

My biggest personal lesson was that this type of job can be all-consuming. There came a point when I let my career define me. I was on the road so much it was hard to nurture my personal relationships and care for myself. This is where I really got the importance of setting boundaries—and valuing myself enough to know that I wanted more out of life than a just high-paying job.
